MOSBY'S GUERRILLAS.

Reported Death of the Chief of the Band.

Sketch of Mosby's Life and Operations.

His Successor in Command.

WASHINGTON, August 30, 1863.

I have just received a despatch from Fairfax Station, saying that five men of Mosby's guerrillas were reported to have been killed in the battle of the Bull Run.

The despatch further states that Mosby was shot twice in the breast and head, and that he had been taken to Richmond.

The guerrillas who were reported to have been killed were those of Dranesville yesterday that Mosby did not take place on Friday.

The prisoners say that they do not doubt the report, as he was pronounced to be mortally wounded.

White now commands the Confederate force north of the railroad.

Sketch of Mosby, Guerrilla Chief.

Major John S. Mosby, chief of the guerrilla force operating in the vicinity of the Alexandria and Orange Railroad, was a native of Virginia, and was a young man when he assumed the command of a guerrilla company as its captain, operating as a part of Major General Stuart's rebel cavalry.

This company was but small in numbers, but made up in quickness of movement what it lacked in respect to size.

One of the most successful of Mosby's many dashing expeditions was the one made into Fairfax Court House during March last, on which occasion he captured General Stoughton while surrounded by his forces, took him out of his bed, at headquarters, and carried him off to Richmond.

At this time he was in search of the Acting General of the cavalry—Colonel Wythe—who had been called to Washington, and so escaped the trait Mosby, Brown, captured him, and sent him to Richmond.

The band, who were but twenty-five in number, secured and carried off a large number of horses belonging to Union officers and cavalry at the same time that they secured the above named and thirty other prisoners.

General Stuart, in his official report and general orders, describes the feat as "unparalleled in the war," but since that time Kilpatrick, Grierson, Oran, and others have shown much more than the shade.

Shortly after that occasion Mosby was promoted to the rank of major, and his company, with that of Captain White, was formed into a battalion, making recruits among the farmers and their sons in the counties bordering along the railroad line.

Continually using upon the columns of our army, but more especially operating against the communications between Washington and the main Army of the Potomac, never daring to meet any very large organized force, but ready to attack trains, &c., when unprotected.

General Stahel, while commanding the cavalry in that vicinity, on several occasions gave chase to Mosby's band, but no sooner were they attacked than they at once dispersed, scattering in all directions, only to meet again and organize at some preconcerted point.

One of the more recent raids of Mosby's cavalry was made against a train during the present month, on which occasion he succeeded in capturing about fifty soldiers, several of the most and part of the small guard. A force was sent out to recapture the men and their property, when the guerrillas did not meet, after a running fight, into an ambush, and caused them to suffer considerably in killed and wounded. During the contest it is reported that Mosby received the wounds, from the effects of which he is supposed to have died.
